The organizational problem.

The CEO was disappointed. He'd spent months with his executive team developing a new organizational strategy. He'd then spent weeks flying around the country on a road show to communicate the new strategy. He set up a number of projects to implement the strategy. Strategic objectives were put into each of his executives' KPAs:

"I am tired of being the only one driving the strategy!"

implemented. As they focused on one project, they forgot about the strategy, the company vision and other projects. Work was being duplicated. His people were confused. Different projects were working at cross purposes to one another. His people simply could not see how everything fitted together.

The CEO felt quite alone in driving the corporate strategy. He wished that his team would:

- Realize that they were in it together. That they needed to work together as a unified team, rather than in separate silos - often
